for field measurements or observations. Sampling incorporates concepts of survey intensity, spatial variability, and mapping scale, and is usually the most costly aspect of a survey (Webster and Olivier 1990). Ideally, sampling should be as cheap as possible while consistent with the required level of accuracy and precision.

Two of the main methods for dealing with spatial heterogeneity are spatial stratified sampling in design-based sampling and MSN (means of surfaces with nonhomogeneity) sampling in model-based sampling (Wang et al., 2009a).

3 Spatial Sampling Spatial sampling, the second part of the proposed simulation paradigm, decouples the size of the design space from the number of simulations required to understand design trends by selectively simulating a modest number of points within the space. We first describe the synergies between spatial sampling and existing techniques in temporal sampling.

Spatial sampling Principles and methods of spatial sampling have been described briefly in Section 2.2.8, Spatial sampling , and some of the general concepts are explored in more detail in Dixon and Leach (1977, CATMOG 17) and more recently in Delmelle (2008).
