5th(14) The Atmosphere: The Ocean of Air Above Us. The Earth is surrounded by an ocean of gases we call the atmosphere. The atmosphere is important because it contains the air most living things breathe. It also absorbs heat energy from the sun. It even recycles water by returning it back to the Earth as rain.

The oceans and the salts dissolved in them probably all formed early in the Earth's history. Although planetary degassing is occurring, as evidenced by studies of rare gases in rocks, the oceans, and the atmosphere, there is also a loss of water to the mantle via subduction.

, petroleum and natural the rate at which an excess amount of CO<sub>2</sub> in the atmosphere is absorbed by the oceans. The exchange rate of isotopically labeled CO<sub>2</sub> between atmosphere and ocean, which, in principle, could be deduced from C14 measurements, is not identical with the rate of absorption, but is related to it.

• (6) The Boussinesq approximation is valid for the ocean and approximately valid for the planetary boundary layer in the atmosphere. It is not accurate in the troposphere, due to the compressibility of air. But if one uses pressure coordinates, the pressure term is also linearized and the flow is incompressible.
